

Employee Spotlight: Nick Del Duca

At Big Horn Armory, every member of our team brings something unique to the table.

This month, we're spotlighting Nick Del Duca, a man whose passion for history and firearms converges in a way that makes him an invaluable part of our operation.

Nick's path to Big Horn Armory wasn't a conventional one. Before joining our team, he worked extensively in the museum field and is also currently employed at the Buffalo

Bill Center of the West. His career has included numerous roles in IT, proving that a strong foundation in technology and history can go hand in hand in the firearms industry.

Nick currently serves as a sales representative at Big Horn Armory, but his contributions go far beyond that. He not only handles sales and customer service but also ensures our website remains up-to-date and visually appealing. His eye for detail and dedication to customer satisfaction make him a key asset to our team.

A Passion for Firearms

Nick's entry into the firearms world was through his work cataloging collections at the Museum of the Rockies and his extensive involvement with the Cody Firearms Museum. This hands-on experience gave him a deep appreciation for the craftsmanship and legacy of firearms, leading him to Big Horn Armory.

Nick's first firearm was a Whitney Wolverine, a sleek .22LR pistol from the 1950s with an all-aluminum design that was ahead of its time. Despite its commercial failure due to poor marketing, the Wolverine remains a standout in firearm design history.

Why Big Horn Armory?

Nick has been with Big Horn Armory for several months now, and what he enjoys most is interacting with customers.

“It's fun to bring satisfaction to people and get them rifles that they will love for a lifetime,” he says.

His enthusiasm for helping others find the perfect firearm is evident in everything he does.

For Nick, the Model 89 is the pinnacle of what Big Horn Armory offers. “I love the classic lever-action feel, and the higher-end Model 89s are absolutely stunning,” he shares.

With its blend of tradition and modern performance, the Model 89 holds a special place in his heart.

Life Beyond Firearms

When he's not at Big Horn Armory, Nick enjoys archery, board games, and his latest hobby—fishkeeping. Whether it's hitting a target, strategizing over a game, or maintaining a thriving aquarium, Nick approaches his hobbies with the same dedication he brings to his work.

At Big Horn Armory, we take pride in the people who make our brand what it is. Nick's expertise, customer-first attitude, and passion for history make him an integral part of our team.
